The question viewed here with the greater interest in that the French Government seem landably desirous of securing a portion of this valuable trade which we have so long neglected. By their protectorate over the kingdom of Annam and its tributary State of Tonguin, they come in direct territorial contract with Burmah and China; and they avowedly aim at withdrawing by the Sankoi river to Tonquin a large share of the trade of the Western Provinces of China-viz., Yunan, Szechuen, and Kwei-chow. Unless some systematic efforts are made by the Chambers of Commerce in England and the Anglo-Burman merchants here. I fear there is every chance of our being forestalled in the many markets in those Provinces, and this will happen at the very time when circumstances seem to make them available to us. The most amusing part of the story bis tale with considerable energy and even vehemence. Mr. Page is a wharfinger and general merchant, a man of substance, and known where merchants, most do congregate. It anneared from his evidence, which was very volubly given, that he had originally been strongly prejudiced to the effect that the dethe express purpose of unmasking the prethe last word I utter:" and to this vantage-

He judged him, he explained, small and delicate, while Orton's feet and hands for murder, of a negro named Hardy Jones, at were large, almost to deformity; by his hands Newburn, on the previous day: -Set into the more especially-which had obviously never wall of the guol building, at an altitude of been used to handle ropes, but were plump about thirty feet from the ground, was a heavy and dainty; by his voice, which was alto- beaut through which run, by meuns of pulleys, gether unlike Orton's; by his manners, which the rope, with the balter at the end. To the were those of a perfect gentleman and not other extremity of this rope was attached a of a "boor;" and by the further fact that he stood "a most severe crossexamination." As against all this, Mr. Hawkins | ten feet high into the air. The plan was consucceeded in eliciting that the witness still ceived in a just spirit of humanity, and with holds "Sir Roger's" note of hand for £300; a landable disposition to lessen the tortures that the £500 advanced by Shout is "in all pro- of the condemned wretch, but its execution bability" unpaid; and that the " severe cross- was bungled and barbarous, owing to a lack examination" to which Mr. Page subjected the of experience on the part of the officials who defendant was, in effect, to ask him what he conducted this legal tragedy. The death sigknew of Wapping I to which the defendant unl was given, and at thirty minutes past eleven very promptly replied that he knew nothing, the body of the condemned man was shot up into Before leaving the box, however, Mr. Page, in the air fully ten feet, rebounding back four feet, reply to a question put by Mr. Justice Mellor, and then swinging to and fro with a motion stated most positively that, on his return from that made the spectacle more horrible and Chili, Arthur Orton word small gold carrings, | ghastly. The neck was not broken by either

"I know he wore them." said he. "but I cannot prove it "-a remark which he explained to the body remained so perfectly motionless for mean that he had seen the earrings in Orton's a moment that the impression prevailed among cers, but could not swent to the precise date at the witnesses that he was dead. After that which his ears were pierced, or the name of the operator. To Mr. Page succeeded a Mr. Salleway, a sailmaker, of Old Gravel-lane, who was apprenticed within four or five doors of the Ortons, knew all the family well, and had been a schoolfellow of Arthur's. Mr. Salleway gave his evidence with remarkable vivacity, to hang forty minutes. and although requiring the occasional stimulus of a glass of water, yet beld his own against the terrible Mr. Hawking very bravely.

That the defendant was not Arthur Orton be was absolutely certain. "If he was Arthur Orton," said he, " he would have known me." Equally certain was he that Arthur Orton wore earrings. And when asked where be had first seen the defendant and under what circumatances, he wont on to give a most humorous account of a meeting which took place at the White Lion, Shadwell, and at which the Chimant's friends and sympathisers appear to have there?" asked Mr. Hawkins, in his most persussive manner, "Well, there was a Mr. Bambridge there, but there's no call to mention his name." "Why not?" "Why, because he says to me: 'Why don't you go on Hawkins's side?' he says. 'I am,' says he, 'an' I'm well paid, too." To do Mr. Hawkins justice, he took this direct attack upon his own integrity with infinite good nature, and in no way altered the half-playful tone with which he had up to this moment been sifting Mr. Salleway's testimony.

It is perhaps allowable to summarise, without the least attempt at colour, the nett results of the day. Six Wapping witnesses have been called, all respectable men, and warranting the Chairmant's criticism upon Wapping, that it a very respectiabel place." Of these one is a wharfinger, one a sailmaker, one a lighterman and barge owner, one a shoemaker, and two retired tradesmen. All knew Arthur Orton as a boy; all are certain that the defendant is not he; three remember that Orton wore earrings, and have seen them in his cars; and against only one, Mr. Page, can it be urged that he is in the slightest degree interested in the result one of the courts, by which it is now ruled that of the trud. Nor is this all. One or two little husbands who lose their wives by railway accifacts occurred in the course of the day which were peculiarly significant. Hence the failure of many companies, and the rapid accumulation of debt upon weak borrowing States, which frequently, indeed, receive very little in notnal cash or its equivalent for all the indebtedness they incur. All this, however, is no concern of the Syndicates, which look only to the floating of the issue and their profits, and trouble themselves very little with the final results of their costly financing. What does concern them, however, is their position when the public do not come in. Usually the arrangement is that if the public do

The shares or stocks will be applied for according to Stock Exchange rules, but really they will be unissued and will be filtered out to the public through the Syndicate from time to time. Any balance left unsold when the Syndicate period expires is then distributed pro rate among its members. And here arise the peculiar dangers to the public to which we have referred. If they subscribe to new issues, On Shanghal. they run a serious risk of depressed markets for a long period on account of the competition with the Syndicates, which can afford to sell very much under the price made to the public. The expiring of the Syndicate period is usually a very critical date, because the individual members have sometimes a balance to sell, and if they have made a bandsome profit on the remainder do not care for a small loss in order to close their accounts. The risk of this depreciation of a new issue which is "Syndicated" to travelling trader. is manifestly a powerful reason for never subscribing.
